Here is why it's a good fit for you:

You have strong written and verbal communication skills.

You gained this skill through your experience in developing intelligence reports. Your time as a 35F in the army taught you the ability to think, speak, and write clearly in varying situations.

You pay great attention to detail.

As an intelligence analyst for the army, you have experience in preparing detailed intelligence products to support your combat commander. You carefully considered what you wrote because the decisions made directly affected your entire unit.

You have strong organization skills.

When managing analytical reports you were systematic in your organization. You established a detailed cross-reference for all intelligence records and files.

You are familiar with using computer systems.

You are an expert user of Microsoft Office and other analysis tools. You are also a quick learner of new software applications.
