It's Long Past Time to

Open the Books!

If you're a student, you give Carnegie Mellon almost $35,000 each year to cover tuition, housing, and food. Don't you want to know where that money goes? Don't you have a right to know where that money goes? Why has the University refused to open its accounting to the view of students and faculty?

We, the under-signed, believe that it is our right as members of the Carnegie Mellon community to know where our money is going. We recognize that not all information about our budget should be made public, but we believe that the University has an obligation to share as much information as it can without violating the privacy of individuals or damaging our relationship with other Universities.

It's long past time, Carnegie Mellon: Open the books!
